

“Exceptional human beings must be given exceptional educational treatment, treatment which takes into account their special difficulties. Further, we can show that despite abnormality, human beings can fulfill their social role within the community, especially if they find understanding, love and guidance.”

Hans Asperger

“I don’t identify myself as someone who has AS, I identify myself as a human being. Most of the time it doesn’t enter in to what I think about.”

Robert Moyer- young man with AS

Asperger's Syndrome (AS)

General Overview of AS

AS is an Autistic disorder most notable for the discrepancy between intellectual and social abilities of those who have the disorder.

Two out of every 10,000 children have AS. Boys are three to four times as likely as girls to have the disorder.

The onset of AS commonly occur after the age of 3. Symptoms will vary depending on age, development, environment and circumstance.

Each individual with AS is unique. Individuals may not exhibit all of the characteristics commonly associated with AS.

Characteristics Associated With AS

Behaviors or characteristics typically observed in individuals with AS:

Social Skills

- Immature social skills and peer interactions leading to difficulty making and keeping friends
- Difficulties in less structured settings and with multiple transitions
- Subtle tendencies to misinterpret information, particularly abstract or figurative/idiomatic language
- Difficulties understanding the consequences and repercussions of their own behaviors, often getting in power struggles with adults and peers
- Problems regulating social/emotional responses

Communication

- Lacks the ability to understand and use the rules governing social exchanges. They often talk at people, disregarding the listener's interest or attention
- Difficulties carrying on reciprocal conversations, presents either too much or too little information
